Precociousness In Love If All Men Would Only Stop, Look and Listen, They Could Prevent Many Tragedles.

By Bentrice Fairfax -

"Precociousness in love making is a great mistake. It prevents the enjoyment of youthful years, which should be free from anxiety, and leads to entanglements and hasiy attachments, which cause much distress."—E. J. Hardy.

HEN a girl is between twelve and sixteen she looks so much like a large-sized doll that those of the other sex treat her as such, taking no account that in her little body there is a heart with a capacity for suffering greater than any woman's, and a soul that is like an untried instrument, waiting for the mastried instrument, waiting for the master's hand to strike the chords.

If he strikes it gently, evoking a melody that is sweet and pure, that melody becomes the keynote of her existence. If, thinking only of his own bdutal passions, he strikes chords that should lie dormant, he wrecks the instrument and ruins her life.

If all the men, young and old, would only stop, look and listen, what a tale of tragedles might remain untold! If they confined their love making to they confined their love making to women grown; if they observed in love the golden rule in sport, to fight only with those their own size, there would not be so many mothers and fathers most be so many mothers and fathers weeping over premature graves today!

"The heart of a young girl is the home of dreams." In her dreams the man who comes to her with a story of love is brave and noble and good and true. Her father has never decieved her; her mother is the spirit of truth; her friends are loyal; she doesn't know what deceil means. She is trusted and what deceil means. She is trusted and she trusts. She has always believed what others tell her; how naturni that she continues to believe when some

The trust and innocence of youth, which should be a bulwark of defence, becomes the drawbridge by which the enemy enters and takes possession.

An effort is making all over the civilized world to protect young girls with the armor of knowledge. A good thing, but not enough. So long as there are young girls in the world, there will be hearts with a woman's longing for love, accompanied by brains with only a child's capacity for reasoning.
